We could all use a bit more color in our lives. But how much more do we really need? In this talk we will discuss the famous map coloring problem, which asks for the smallest number of colors that allows you to draw a map in such a way that neighboring regions have different colors. This talk will be accessible to all undergraduates.